New Zealander gives up marathon to save a stranger

Barry Eunson, a St John Ambulance Intensive Care Paramedic from Alexandra, Central Otago, New Zealand had trained for five months for the Dublin Marathon 2014.

Along with 15,000 athletes, Eunson was making his way through the streets but half way through the marathon, a young man collapsed in front of him. Initially, thinking the man had tripped, Eunson carried on. But something made him turn around.

"I thought, 'hang on, he didn't trip, he collapsed' and I looked back and he was having a seizure. No-one else had stopped so I went back."

There were a lot of people gathered on the street, and he yelled out for someone to call an ambulance, he said.

"The problem was there were 15,000 runners so getting through the crowd took nearly an hour. The ambulance was only manned by lower-trained staff, they had drugs on board but couldn't use them, so they allowed me to use their gear and drugs."

An advance care officer arrived, and together they put a lifepack on him and Eunson was asked to travel in the back of the ambulance to the hospital. But as they were about to leave, a French woman had collapsed on the road and Eunson offered to stay with her until another ambulance arrived. By now an hour-and-a-half had passed, and the race was well and truly over.

"The really sad thing for me was the people were there all getting their t-shirts and medals. But a finishing medal versus the Irish man's life — I made the right choice. No medal for me but a sense of caring that was appreciated by all."

With a 'Did Not Finish' against his name, Eunson returned home to Alexandra. However Eunson's friend had contacted the marathon organisers and told them his story without Eunson's knowledge.

They sent Eunson not only a shirt and finishing medal, but also paid for a return flight to Dublin for Eunson to get a chance to finish the race this year. The race director hopes to reunite Eunson with the man whose life he saved.

Saving new mothers and newborn babies from complications

On 15th March, it was Mother's Day in the UK where we celebrated motherhood, maternal bonds, and the influence of mothers in society.

Sadly in sub-Saharan Africa, many new mothers and newborn babies die every year from complications in pregnancy and childbirth which could so easily have been avoided.

Help us by supporting the St John's Mother and Baby Programme to train more local volunteers within the community to help mothers and newborn babies.

St John Scotland starts major defibrillator project

A major partnership between St John Scotland and the Scottish Golf Union was launched earlier this year to provide a life-saving defibrillator device to all Scottish Golf Union and Scottish Ladies Golfing Association national event venues over the next three years.

With better availability of defibrillators, and the necessary training, could lead to the lives of golfers across the country being saved.

Each year 100,000 people die from sudden cardiac arrest in the UK. CPR and early defibrillation with an automated external defibrillator can increase sudden cardiac arrest survival from 5% to over 50%.

The importance of defibrillators was brought into sharp focus in August 2013 when the former Ryder Cup captain, Bernard Gallacher, collapsed and suffered a sudden cardiac arrest during a dinner at a hotel. But thanks to the hotel's defibrillator and the immediate action of trained staff, he survived.
